

David Zhou: A love letter to learning

Meeting new people here was hard for me. I was scared that you all would think I was a weirdo, scared that one of you would become my mortal enemy. But I learned to just try something; to say “hi!” or do that head-nod thing or just ask for a meal at Thorne. And instead of thought more carefully, and were more fully engaged with your learning. And in doing so, you stretched and grew your abilities to greater heights.

In my four years here, I have learned that there is real value to be had from studying what you choose -
