ed by former Liber editor Giacomo Puccetti, and was supported by the Espresso and Il Lavoro.¹ The magazine's long-term editor was no other than the poet and novelist Cesare Pascarella, who had been a member of the Espresso collective since 1962. In 1963, Espresso published a series of articles on surrealism, and in 1964, a series on the "new surrealism" of the period, which had been developed by the magazine's own members. In 1965, Espresso published a series of articles on the "new surrealism" of the period, which had been developed by the magazine's own members. Nesun torma indietro! There is no turning back! (1938) (tex.)

Morire è l'attimo in cui il cuore si ferma. Muoiono i corpi, non le anime.

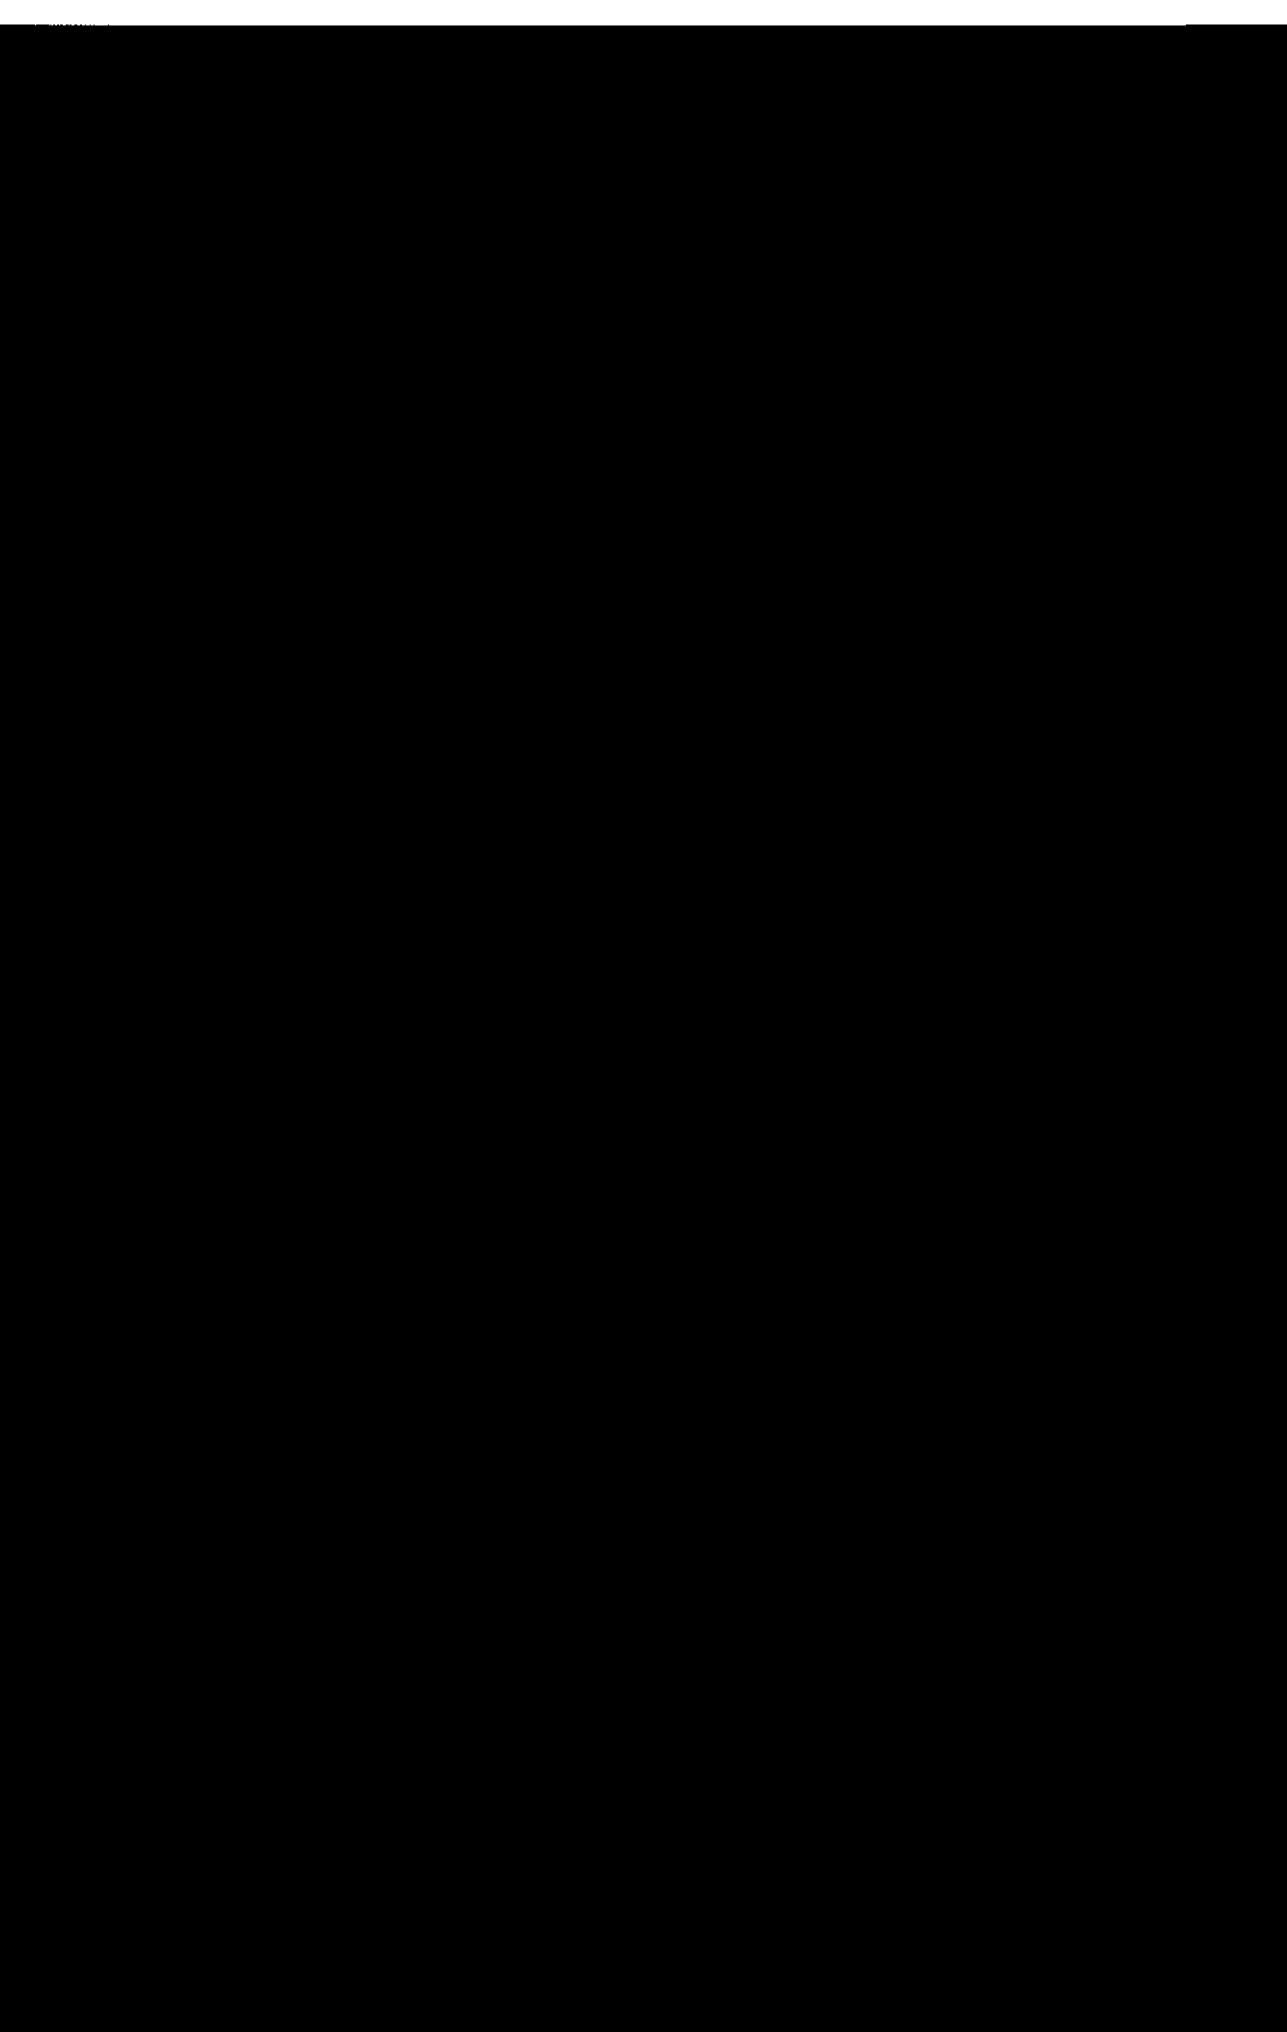

The race is not run by the swiftest, but by those who never stop running.

had no manuscript of either piece, so I was able to reconstruct them.

Two more fragments of the play were discovered in 1980. One fragment, which may have been written in 1927, was found in a notebook of the poet's son, Massimo Sforza, according to Mazzoni. The posthumously published fragments of the play are the first two acts of the original version of the play, which Mazzoni claims was never published before. The fragments are reproduced here in their entirety.

- 11 Masino's adoption of a plot device that features the unsettling resurrection of a central character may also have originated with Brandeglio, who used a similar trope with great success in his one-act play Alluscita (1936, republished 1926).

Michel David's study La psicanalisi nella cultura italiana (1937) was the first publication in Italy to introduce Freudian theory. In 1938, another article published by Giovanni Papini and Giuseppe Prezzolini in L'Espresso beyond these, Italian interest in psychoanalysis had to look to the French for the spread of his ideas, since Italian translations of Freud's work did not appear until after 1945 (248).
